Partnerships Help Heal Our Community’s Children

Dr. Robin Foster is no stranger to what poverty and violence can do to a family; she sees it every day. She works to help our community’s most vulnerable neighborhoods recover one person at a time. But to hear her tell it, it isn’t a one woman show and it takes the whole community to help children and families heal.

If you ask Dr. Foster, who is the Director of Pediatric Emergency and the Child Protection Team at Children’s Hospital of Richmond at VCU (CHoR), this healing takes “grassroots” organizations, like ChildSavers. When she speaks about grassroots, she does not mean campaigning or activism, but community based. These organizations are in the neighborhoods that need help. They build personal relationships and are trusted, reliable, and passionate.

She said, “If someone shows up in the ER they are in crisis and the majority are not just in medical crisis, but social crisis as well. So, I try to figure out what is happening at home. Has the heat been shut off? Is the mother out of formula? What resources do I know of and have at my disposal that I can give to these families in crisis?” Dr. Foster uses her network of grassroots partners to help, “I love that I can call and get support for these families. It could be as simple as making a phone call to get a car seat. These simple measures can help a parent de-stress.” But sometimes the resources they need are beyond the material and the hurt is more than skin deep.

ChildSavers is among the resources that Dr. Foster uses to help families. When asked what prompts her to make a referral to ChildSavers she said that it involved two difference scenarios. The first scenario occurs after an acute trauma incident. Medical personnel and family see that a child needs mental health services. Often these families do not have the resources to get the help they need. The second scenario involves more than one visit to the ER and attention to detail on the part of the staff. Dr. Foster said, “Sometimes kids have something that happened to them and it wasn’t recognized as a traumatic event the first time around. It isn’t until they return to the ER with anxiety issues or other physical symptoms that it becomes apparent.” When either scenario occurs, Dr. Foster makes a referral to ChildSavers.

When the calls come in, often it is the Mental Health Program Manager, John Richardson-Laue, who answers. According to Richardson-Laue, “When a child experiences trauma, it is a violation of safety, security, trust, and his or her sense of self. Trauma-focused therapy works to help the child re-establish these essential elements of childhood. The referrals from Dr. Foster and her team are essential for getting children the services they need to help heal.”

Success for a child and family experiencing violence and poverty requires partnerships between “grassroots” organizations, like ChildSavers, and CHoR’s pediatric emergency room and Child Projection Team. It also requires dedicated individuals, like Dr. Foster, who tend not just to the immediate needs of a patient, but help in a deeper, more profound way. This drive to do more is ultimately, what leads to healing beyond the physical, and gets to the root of a problem.

Story of Hope

It is dark, and the small closet she is kept in is cramped. Her nose itches and eyes burn from a strong smell nearby. Her breathing has become labored and she is so hungry. Sometimes the door opens and she gets food. Sometimes the door opens and she only has a moment to crouch and cover her face before she feels the belt. This is Betsy’s* life; she is only four years old. This is all she knew until she was admitted to the VCU Medical Center’s Pediatric ER for breathing problems.

When the doctors examine her, they find evidence of long-term abuse; they can see the belt marks on her skin. Betsy is so thin; it is obvious that she is malnourished. Her respiratory problems are related to the chemicals kept in the closet where she was held, it was the awful smell that burned her eyes.

Together, the police and doctors collect evidence that leads to the arrest of Betsy’s parents. Betsy is placed in a foster home and her life changes forever.

Betsy’s new family helps her to heal. Her skin mends, she begins to eat well, and her breathing improves. Though on the outside her body has recovered, there are still wounds on the inside. Betsy and her new family come to ChildSavers for therapy. Betsy’s new family and her therapist are helping her know that love doesn’t have to hurt and that home can be a safe place.

Betsy learns to draw when she is angry or scared, and how to ask for help. In therapy, Betsy’s foster parents are learning how to support Betsy during her rage and sadness. Together they are forming a foundation built on love, support, and resiliency.

In a recent therapy session, Betsy drew a picture of herself as a superhero, breaking chains and flying into the arms of her foster parents and away from a punishing dragon. For the first time in her life, Betsy knows what it is to be safe and loved.

Why is Quality Early Child Care Important?

In the first three years of life, a child will soak up more information than she ever will again. This is a crucial age and the care that a child receives can have lasting effects well into adulthood. According to an article by the American Academy of Pediatrics on the effects of quality early child care, children’s brains are powerfully influenced and affected by their experiences and surroundings. The Academy states that these experiences affect the functional and structural brain development of a child and influence a child’s development and learning. Both positive and negative experiences of the child have lasting impact on the child, family, and even society.

The Academy also states that high quality early care for lower-income children results in greater school success, higher rates of graduation from high school, lower rates of juvenile crime, a decrease in special education services, and even lower adolescent pregnancy rates. Compared to lower-quality care, The Academy found that children who attended higher-quality child care programs showed better language, math, cognition, social, interpersonal relationships, and behavioral self-regulation skills. Further, the study finds that poor quality child care can harm school performance, and social and language development.

The results are clear, when a child receives quality pre-k education their development is enriched and furthered than if they do not. According to Child Care Aware, the Nation’s leading expert on child care, “Children who receive care in quality, responsive, and nurturing early learning environments have opportunities to establish healthy habits and get a jump start on school readiness.” Recent national reports on school readiness stated that more than 85% of children who began school without the skills needed to succeed are still behind in fourth grade.

Investing in quality early child care is essential for not just ensuring the success and health of a child, but of the adult they will become.
